

It was B. Here's what it did with one line.

A

"Build a premium SaaS landing page with animations, pricing and FAQ."

B

A link to a site, plus: "match this design language, build a landing page."

C

"Make it look like Apple, but for staff rotas."

It studied the reference, pulled its design tokens, then built and checked every section.

Then it found three of its own bugs and fixed them.

What it flagged about its own work

WordPress encoded the & in the animation script, which silently broke the motion layer.

A button rendered dark on dark because of a CSS cascade clash.

A floating card overlapped a badge.
